In Das Kapital, Marx lays claim to having discovered "the economic law of motion of modern society". It is, first of all, a law of progress: capital-driven economy, as the sketch in the Communist Manifesto predicts, "has created more massive and colossal productive forces than have all preceding generations together"; it has fostered technology and science and created the world market.

Das Kapital is the supreme example of the dialectical mind in action, of the dialectical mind using all its power of abstraction to plough up layer after layer of empirical social experience. Marx was, of course, greatly concerned with the problems of his philosophical workshop as well, and with the nature of his intellectual tools, those he had inherited from others and those he himself invented.
