Lightly scoring a starting point in the finish with a sharp putty knife will give you a good entry point once the finish is heated. The idea is to soften and lift the finish without burning it, so it is important to keep the gun moving while heating. With the gun set on the lowest setting, start warming up the scored area on the guitar.

Just a quick question on what you guys think the easiest, or rather hardest to screw up DIY guitar body finish would be. I'm so jealous of the Strat #18 threads and such, but I'm always afraid of the finishing aspect. I would want to try something thinner and less restrictive than that poly I have on my current guitars.
