A young Japanese hostess becomes the object of a dangerous man's obsession. Minimalist Ogawa (The Housekeeper and the Professor, 2009, etc.) trades the eccentric relationships of her debut novel for a much darker affair in her latest plumbing of human experience. In an overgrown inn in a sedate seaside town, 17-year-old Mari tries to keep the peace between the customers and her abrasive mother.

Lotus Reads: Hotel Iris by Yoko Ogawa

Ogawa continues to impress me with her exquisite, sparse prose that falls from the pages like transparent cherry blossom petals. That is where the similarities between The Housekeeper and the Professor and Hotel Iris end. Hotel Iris has a dark, disturbing undertone to the story that may make this a difficult story for some individuals to read.
