About - The Human Dignity Foundation
Abstract. This chapter investigates whether human rights are grounded in human dignity. Starting from an interest-based account of human rights, it rejects two objections to that account that have been pressed in the name of human dignity: the deontological and the personhood objections.

Human Dignity « Catholic Social Teaching
This chapter investigates whether or not human rights are grounded in human dignity. Starting from an interest-based account of human rights, it rejects two objections to that account that have been pressed in the name of human dignity: the deontological and the personhood objections. More positively, it contends that human dignity is the equal moral status possessed by all human beings simply ...

Human Dignity and the Foundations of Human Rights ...
This chapter examines the claim that human dignity is the foundation of human rights. The proposition, or something like it, is found in the preambles of the major human rights conventions, and is also common in the rhetoric of scholars addressing the subject of rights. The claim is often made loosely; sometimes it is barely more than a piece of decorative rhetoric.
