Leica M5 - Wikipedia

Leica M5: yesterday's outcast, today's star? Funny, how time changes things. When introduced in 1971, the Leica M5 was usually condemned because of its large size-- despite the fact that the M5 was the first M with TTL metering. I suspect that if it were introduced today, the size would not be that big an issue.

However the M5 is still a Leica and with the Leica name you get the Leica-ness that is so coveted. The M5 has the beautiful, bright viewfinder, the smooth kiss like feel of the shutter curtain and the ability to use some of the best glass in the business. The M5 is also Leica's first rangefinder with an inbuilt TTL meter.

the Leica M5 was really the WTF as far as Leica M cameras were concerned. I was lucky in that after purchasing, a battery for it and installing that battery the camera's built in light meter went to work. The meter is a match needle, affair that is controlled through adjustment of the lens's aperture ring.
