The N8008 bridged the gap between the Nikon F3 and F4, the N90 the gap between the F4 and F5, and in 1999 the Nikon F100 would link the F5 (released three years earlier) to the upcoming Nikon F6. Nikon's bridge cameras often offered customers the opportunity to try the latest camera technology before it made it into a flagship for professionals.

The F80 can't meter with manual lenses, the F100 shutter is about the quietest out there. The F80 in my opinion, is a typical slightly crippled camera from Nikon, that leaves out many features that a camera like the F100 has. I had an N80 for quite a while, and it's not a bad camera, but lacks the build quality of the F100.

I have both the Nikon N80 (model name except USA is F80) and the F100. I also have the vertical grip for the F100. and without exception, I always grab the F100 when I still wanna run some film. better controls, better feel in my hands, much better AF motor (IMHO), more contols. the weird thing about these cameras is the custom menu settings.

The F100 looks like an F5 without the extended grip, and a cursory glance at the F100's controls will make an F5 user grin in recognition (alas, the grin will go away upon reading the part of the manual that describes the custom functions; more on that later).
