Sowing the Seeds: Christian Fiction
These seeds represent the emotional response to the Word. The rocky soil person hears God's Word with joy, but because he has no root in himself, he gives up at the first challenge to his faith. The seeds among thorns spring up, but get choked out by the thorns that surround them. This is a worldly response to the Word.

(Of course, this hinges upon the notion that Christian fiction is, in the long run, actually making better disciples. But that's another post.) But if Christian fiction is best understood as a ministry to believers and best functions as a tool for discipleship, it raises other questions, namely: the place of evangelism in Christian fiction.
