The Empire silhouette defines a dress with a high waist and a long and loosely falling skirt, which lengthens and flatters the body but does not always make it look slim. Fabrics were light to the point of being sheer below the bodice, which made them easier to keep clean.

Gilles Lipovetsky. The Empire of Fashion: Dressing Modern ...

In The Empire of Fashion, French philosopher Gilles Lipovetsky provocatively places the individual and individualism at the center of his interpretive history of the past 600 years of fashion in the West: the distinctive modern fashion system, which began to emerge in the late middle ages, has been driven, Lipovetsky argues, not merely by conspicuous consumption and social distinction, as sociologists from Thorstein Veblen to Pierre Bourdieu have argued, but by a celebration of the ...
