In the third stage ["Cruelty in Perfection"], Nero has been captured after committing a series of robberies, including the murder of the woman who carries his child. He will be hung. In stage four ["The Reward of Cruelty"], as was often the fate of those executed by the State, his body has been turned over to surgeons for dissection. Some art historians suggest Nero "is represented as still alive, for it was a particular fear of criminals that they would survive the hanging and be conscious ...
