Although the role of uranium mining communities is new, it is deeply rooted in the region's history. Like all mining communities, the uranium towns were often located in remote places tied to larger trade networks. They were usually small, almost forgotten sites that became instant boomtowns when uranium was discovered. Like other such places ...

Yellowcake Towns Uranium Mining Communities

In the early 1980s, residents of America's oldest uranium town, Uravan, Colorado, could look back on their town's past and see the evolution of uranium in U.S. national security. After providing yellowcake for the Manhattan Project's first atomic bombs during World War II, the town had mirrored the boom and bust of the postwar uranium industry.
